Space Exploration Technologies Corp. announced the commencement of a senior unsecured notes offering on Monday, its first entry into the public bond market, days after completing the largest initial public offering on record.

At least $20 billion is the target for the offering, with bonds maturing across a range spanning five to 30 years. SpaceX said in its SEC filing that it intends to use the net proceeds to repay outstanding borrowings under its bridge loan facility in full, cover related fees and expenses, and apply any remainder to general corporate purposes.

The notes will be sold to qualified institutional buyers under Rule 144A and to non-U.S. persons under Regulation S, the company said. They have not been registered under the Securities Act and may not be offered or sold in the United States absent registration or an applicable exemption.

Investor calls are being arranged by the same five institutions — Bank of America, Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, JPMorgan Chase, and Morgan Stanley — that originally extended the bridge financing to SpaceX, Bloomberg reported. The bridge loan accounts for the bulk of SpaceX's roughly $29.1 billion in long-term debt.

SpaceX disclosed in its filing that it held approximately $100.8 billion in cash and cash equivalents as of June 19, 2026. The company received investment-grade ratings from all three major ratings agencies ahead of the offering. Moody's Ratings assigned a Baa1 rating, Fitch Ratings assigned BBB+, and S&P Global Ratings assigned BBB.

Bond proceeds are also earmarked for SpaceX's AI buildout — data centers and related infrastructure among them. Agreements with Google and Anthropic to supply computing capacity are valued at approximately $75 billion in total. SpaceX has also said it is exploring the construction of data centers in space, according to CNBC.

SpaceX's IPO, which priced at $135 per share and pushed the company's market capitalization past \$2 trillion, closed on June 12. The offering raised nearly $86 billion after underwriters exercised the greenshoe allotment. During the IPO roadshow, Bret Johnsen and Gwynne Shotwell signaled to potential shareholders that future capital raises would come through borrowing rather than new equity issuance — effectively treating the IPO as a one-time stock sale.

SpaceX stock fell about 5% Monday. The decline extended a losing streak that began last week, which included a drop tied to MSCI assigning SpaceX its lowest possible ESG rating, a CCC, citing insufficient management of environmental, social, and governance risks.

SpaceX stock slips again as it announces $25 billion bond offering

SpaceX (SPCX) stock is in focus on Wednesday after the company completed a successful debt offering.

Per a statement Tuesday night, the company announced pricing for a $25 billion bond issuance. The offering will be spread across five tranches of senior notes maturing between 2031 and 2056, with interest rates rising from 5.350% on the shortest to 6.650% on the longest.

Reports suggested that SpaceX originally tried to raise $20 billion, but demand for the notes was so great that the company upsized the offering to $25 billion. CNBC reported SpaceX saw nearly $90 billion worth of orders for the debt offering.

SpaceX said it will use the money mainly to pay off a bridge loan it had taken out, cover the deal's fees, and keep whatever is left for general purposes. The company noted the debt will only be offered to large institutional investors and to buyers outside the US.

"I worry that money burns a hole in companies pockets, and so they need to invest every dollar as efficiently as possible," CFRA analyst Keith Snyder said in an interview with Yahoo Finance regarding SpaceX's need to raise cash so close to its IPO. "And all of a sudden they're sitting on 100 billion in cash. That's a big, a big cash stockpile for them to be playing with."

Nevertheless, the successful debt offering comes at a strained moment for the company's stock. Though the stock rebounded slightly yesterday, SpaceX stock hit $149 in early trade, a notable move given the stock debuted at $150. It's a psychologically important level and indicative that SpaceX is following other major market debuts that eventually traded below their offer price.

At $150, SpaceX stock is up only 11% from its IPO price of $135. At one point last week its market cap topped over $2.5 trillion; now it hovers just above $2 trillion.

SpaceX is down around 2% in early trade Wednesday.

SpaceX's rocky post-IPO trading, as well as weakness in Tesla stock recently, has also hit CEO Elon Musk's wealth.

The mercurial Musk was the first person to top $1 trillion in wealth following SpaceX's IPO, but his total net worth on paper has slipped, slightly. Bloomberg's Billionaire's Index now lists Musk's wealth at $957.1 billion, a drop of nearly $360 billion from the high of $1.315 trillion hit in the days after SpaceX's IPO and market debut.

Despite the recent drop, Musk is still worth more than Larry Page, Segey Brin, and Jeff Bezos — combined.

SpaceX Prices $25 Billion Bond Deal as Investor Demand Surges

SpaceX (NASDAQ:SPCX) has priced a $25 billion investment-grade bond offering across five parts, giving Elon Musk's expanded business empire a lower-cost refinancing path after X and xAI were folded into SpaceX. The deal could reduce the group's annual interest burden to about $1.5 billion, compared with roughly $1.8 billion that X and xAI may have paid this year on $17.5 billion of higher-cost debt if that debt had remained outstanding.

Investor demand appeared strong, with orders reaching $89 billion at their peak, allowing SpaceX to secure lower borrowing costs during the marketing process. The bond sale comes shortly after SpaceX's historic $75 billion IPO earlier this month, even as shares lost about a quarter of their value across three sessions before a slight recovery Tuesday.

For investors, the central question is whether Starlink's satellite internet growth and SpaceX's US government rocket contracts could help support xAI's heavy spending long enough for the AI business to become more self-sustaining. xAI generated $3.2 billion in sales last year while posting a $6.4 billion operating loss, suggesting the credit story may depend less on current AI profitability and more on SpaceX's broader ability to fund Musk's long-term platform ambitions.

SPCX Prices $25B Bond Sale

The company priced five tranches of senior unsecured notes on Tuesday, with coupons ranging from 5.35% to 6.65% and maturities stretching from 2031 to 2056. The offering is expected to settle on Friday. SpaceX plans to use the proceeds to repay its bridge loan facility in full, pay related fees and expenses, and use any remaining amount for general corporate purposes.

The bond sale replaces a $20 billion bridge loan SpaceX used to pay off debt tied to xAI, the AI startup founded by Elon Musk and acquired by SpaceX in February. The refinancing could lower annual interest costs. X and xAI would have spent $1.8 billion servicing $17.5 billion of prior debt this year, while SpaceX's new $25 billion bond sale is expected to cost about $1.5 billion annually, Bloomberg noted. Demand was reportedly strong, with orders reportedly peaking near $89 billion.

SpaceX Credit Hinges On Starlink

SpaceX's credit profile is largely underpinned by Starlink's growth trajectory and its government-backed launch business, even as xAI continues to generate significant operating losses. xAI generated $3.2 billion in sales last year but posted a $6.4 billion operating loss, according to filings. Those losses have ballooned from about $1.6 billion in 2024.

By moving into the investment-grade bond market, SpaceX gains access to cheaper and deeper funding than xAI could secure on its own. The development comes as Musk pushes deeper into AI infrastructure and compute-heavy expansion. Recent xAI-related deals with Anthropic, Google and Reflection are expected to boost SpaceX's AI-linked revenue, but the business still requires heavy spending.

Musk’s SpaceX Adds Billions in Debt While Cutting Interest Costs

(Bloomberg) -- Elon Musk is no stranger to financial alchemy. His latest feat: adding billions of dollars of debt onto his cash-burning business empire while simultaneously cutting its annual interest burden.

SpaceX sold $25 billion of investment-grade bonds on Tuesday, marking the final step to replace the costly debt that had helped finance Musk's 2022 acquisition of X, then known as Twitter, as well as the expensive loans and bonds issued by artificial intelligence lab xAI last year to bridge its rapid cash drain.

Those entities would have spent roughly $1.8 billion to service a combined $17.5 billion of debt this year if they hadn't been folded into SpaceX. The business is now set to pay $1.5 billion of interest annually on its $25 billion inaugural bond sale.

Ahead of SpaceX's historic $75 billion initial public offering earlier this month, Musk fused many of his disparate companies into a conglomerate that investors gushed over, even though it doesn't yet make a profit.

The trillionaire has effectively used revenue from Starlink's sales of satellite internet service and SpaceX's rocket contracts with the US government to support heavy spending at xAI, which holds X, the renamed social media app.

"To invest in this, you've essentially got to be a believer," said Art Hogan, chief market strategist at B. Riley Wealth. "You have to believe revenues are going to ramp significantly over the coming years."

Demand for SpaceX debt suggests that many investors have faith. The offering received $89 billion of orders at its peak, a level of market desire that allowed the company to lock in lower interest costs during the course of the marketing process.

Bond buyers were eager to participate even as SpaceX shares have wobbled in the stock market, losing about a quarter of their value across three sessions before making a slight recovery on Tuesday.

A representative for SpaceX didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

So far, investors have jumped at the chance to get a piece of Musk's sprawling company, but SpaceX must now prove that it can balance such different business models and eventually turn its AI business into a boon rather than an albatross.
